Numerous (mostly unscientific) studies have found a correlation between box-office performance and critical reception. (For example: Slate.com/id/2194532/.) Don't read a cause-and-effect relationship into this and claim that audiences follow critics - that criticism matters because it affects audience behavior. Instead, let's just note that audience behavior and critical reception often align. For instance, the top movie at the box office this weekend was the Coen brothers' Burn After Reading, followed by Tyler Perry's The Family That Preys, the decades-late Pacino/De Niro thriller Righteous Kill, and The Women. Check those opening movies' Rotten Tomatoes and Metacritic scores, and you'll see a pattern. Whether you're looking at gross or two measures of critical evaluation, they follow the exact same order. Freaky.   About Box Office Power Rankings Box Office Power Rankings balance box office and critical reception to create a better measure of a movie's overall performance against its peers than gross receipts alone. The weekly rankings cover the 10 top-grossing movies in the United States for the previous weekend. I assign equal weight to box office and critical opinion, with each having two components. The measures are: box-office gross, per-theatre average, Rotten Tomatoes (RottenTomatoes.com) score, and Metacritic (Metacritic.com) score. Why those four? Box-office gross basically measures the number of people who saw a movie in a given weekend. Per-theatre average corrects for blockbuster-wannabes that flood the market with prints, and gives limited-release movies a fighting chance. Rotten Tomatoes measures critical opinion in a binary way. And Metacritic gives a better sense of critics' enthusiasm (or bile) for a movie. For each of the four measures, the movies are ranked and assigned points (10 for the best performer, one for the worst). Finally, those points are added up, with a maximum score of 40 and a minimum score of four. For more Box Office Power Rankings, visit CultureSnob.com/bopr.
