

Me and You and a Blob of Blue: "Monsters Vs. Aliens" and "The Haunting in Connecticut"

Written by Mike Schulz

Sunday, 29 March 2009 17:28

---

- Buy Brainjuice Blog MAC \(en\)
- Buy Ashampoo Powerup 3 \(en\)
- Download ZoneAlarm AntiVirus 8
- Download Infinite Skills - Photoshop For Architects
- Discount - Microsoft Windows Vista Home Basic with SP2 \(64 bit\)
- Buy Eset Smart Security 6 \(32-bit\) \(en\)
- Buy Cheap Brainjuice Blog MAC
- Buy Cheap Microsoft Encarta Premium 2009
- Discount - Microsoft Publisher 2013
- Buy Adobe Dreamweaver CS5.5 \(cs,pl,tr,de,es,it,pt,fr,nl,sv,en\)
- 9.95\$ Lynda.com - MySQL Essential Training cheap oem
- Buy OEM Nik Software HDR Efex Pro
- 249.95\$ Autodesk Algor Simulation Professional 2011 cheap oem
- Discount - Mac OS X Lion: The Missing Manual

MONSTERS VS. ALIENS

After a quick, manic prelude that effectively sets the tone for this quick, manic movie, Dreamworks' animated Monsters Vs. Aliens offers what is doubtless the most promising opening credit of the year, wrapping up its recognition of voice-over actors with: "... and Stephen Colbert as the President."

think.

All right!, you

Success at last!

Yet almost before you can adequately take in the comic possibilities inherent in this priceless bit of casting, Colbert's Prez makes his first appearance, and reveals himself to be ... only sorta kinda funny. Greeting a destructive alien spacecraft with a Vulcan salute and a Casio keyboard, the President initially attempts to make contact with Earth's visitors through the five-note theme from Close Encounters of the Third Kind, which he promptly screws up (sorta funny), and then with Beverly Hills Cop's "Axel F" anthem (kinda funny).

Later in the film, he'll nearly, accidentally launch nuclear missiles, and shriek like a woman, and decree Danger Threat Level Brown "because I have to change my pants," and then, with a half hour to go, he'll vanish completely - and Dreamworks' latest CGI outing

Me and You and a Blob of Blue: "Monsters Vs. Aliens" and "The Haunting in Connecticut"

Written by Mike Schulz
Sunday, 29 March 2009 17:28

---

turns out to be just like Colbert's character: deeply goofy, fitfully funny, and gone before you know it. (The movie runs a swift 90 minutes.)

It's hard to imagine a title more on-the-nose than Monsters Vs. Aliens, and the film earns points, I guess, for giving audiences exactly what they expect. There's a group of monsters, including the skyscraper-sized Susan (voiced by Reese Witherspoon), the mad scientist Dr. Cockroach (Hugh Laurie), the toothy Missing Link (Will Arnett), the turquoise-blue-hued "indestructible gelatinous mass" B.O.B. (Seth Rogen), and the voiceless, fuzzy, 350-foot grub Insectosaurus. There's a bunch of aliens, led by the literally four-eyed Gallaxhar, who boasts the tentacles of an octopus and the voice of Rainn Wilson. Then they all fight. And while I'd like to tell you there's more to than that, there isn't, really; you could easily fit both its plot synopsis and its subplot synopses on a cocktail napkin, and likely still have room left over for a transcription of all the jokes that are legitimately hilarious.

Monsters

Vs. Aliens

Still, as wholly meaningless, throwaway kiddie entertainments go, this one isn't bad. Directors Rob Letterman and Conrad Vernon deliver impressive sci-fi scope - gigantic monsters and spaceships keep getting dwarfed by even more gigantic monsters and spaceships - and the vibrant, colorful animation is rather extraordinary throughout; my weekend movie schedule found me viewing the film in 2D rather than 3D, yet I can't say I noticed any loss of grandeur. And yes, there are lame gags and obvious puns aplenty - Kiefer Sutherland's barking General is unimaginatively named W.R. Monger - but at least they're delivered with cheerful affability, and the casting provides such a plethora of in-joke connections that adults can have a fine time just associating one famous voice with another. (Wilson's co-star John Krasinski shares a scene with Renée Zellweger, who he romanced in Leatherheads

The Office

; Rogen's blob converses with the actor's frequent screen partner Paul Rudd; Gallaxhar's flirtatious computer is voiced by Will Arnett's real-life wife Amy Poehler ... .)

Monsters Vs. Aliens

may not make you laugh all that often, but it's hard to be terribly disappointed by a nearly constant smile.

Written by Mike Schulz
Sunday, 29 March 2009 17:28

---

THE HAUNTING IN CONNECTICUT

If you saw the cineplex trailer for The Haunting in Connecticut - and it would've been tough not to, as it seemed to precede every film released since the first of the year - you might remember how it ended, with a frenzied series of flickering lights and supernatural images and shrieking apparitions leading to the ultimate horror of ...

an out-of-tune piano

! The preview's atonal plinky-plunk music was so ingrained in memory by the time I saw this haunted-house opus that I was shocked, albeit not upset, to discover that the movie actually features no piano, or piano music, whatsoever. Of course, you can't say necessarily needed it; it's plenty out-of-tune all on its own.

The Haunting in Connecticut

For a while, though, director Peter Cornwell almost manages to convince you otherwise. The plot, which concerns a teenage cancer patient (the touching Kyle Gallner) spooked by the spectral goings-on in his family's mortuary-turned-fixer-upper, is your standard scare-flick silliness, yet for more than half its length it's presented with disarming naturalism and an eerie sense of foreboding, and Cornwell guides his actors to effectively tough-minded performances. (Elias Koteas, as a helpful priest, is sensationally good, and Virginia Madsen, with that husky voice that suggests a blessed sanity, is practically a genre godsend.) But as usual in paranormal, "based on a true story" creep-outs of this type, the more events are "explained," the less sense they make, and The Haunting in Connecticut's final reels digress into a noisy and borderline laughable collection of crummy CGI effects, bizarre continuity lapses (day turns to night in record time), ear-splitting bangs and bumps, and screeching violins. By the finale, I felt so assaulted by the din that I would've

killed

for an out-of-tune piano.