

Written by Thom White

Monday, 05 December 2011 07:51

- Buy Cheap Adobe Flash CS3 Professional
- Buy OEM Corel WinDVD Pro 11
- Buy Microsoft Visual Studio Professional 2012 \(32-bit\) \(en\)
- Buy Autodesk AutoCAD Mechanical 2011 \(en\)
- Buy Word 2010 All-in-One For Dummies \(en\)
- Download Lynda.com - PHP with MySQL Essential Training
- Buy Cheap Red Giant Shooter Suite 12
- Buy Cheap Microsoft Encarta Premium 2009
- Download Avid Media Composer 6 MAC \(64 bit\)
- Buy Cheap Red Giant Trapcode Suite 12 \(64-bit\)
- Buy OEM Autodesk Maya 2011 \(32-bit\)
- Buy Cheap Lynda.com - Building and Monetizing Game Apps for iOS

I want to start by saying that I enjoyed the tone of the Clinton Area Showboat Theatre's presentation of Yes, Virginia, There is a Santa Claus. I left Saturday's performance with a warm feeling of Christmas cheer, which seems to me the point of the play, so... Christmas mission accomplished! Yet while there are some notable performances in the piece, it pains me to say that I also have a lot of minor issues with this Showboat production, and particularly with playwright Jamie Gorski's script.

Inspired by a letter written to the New York Sun Times and the newspaper's editorial response, both published more than 100 years ago, the play focuses on a young girl's quest to find out if there really is a Santa Claus. With her sister telling her that Jolly Old Saint Nick isn't real – and her financially troubled pal, Mary Lou, agreeing by pointing out that he's never visited her house – Virginia decides to check with the New York Sun Times personally, because as her father says, "If you see it in the Sun, it must be true."

The story's spirit is sweet, and director Sarah Hayes' careful treatment of the message helps, as do several of the actors. Skyler Pennock's Virginia, her adorably high-pitched voice boasting undertones of hope and uncertainty, is perfect for her part, while Allison Winkel impresses as Virginia's poor friend Mary Lou Parker, mixing sadness and against-the-odds determination in her portrayal. Doug Kutzli showcases notably larger-than-life acting ability as the stereotypical, nose-to-the-grindstone Sun editor Walter Gibson. And Chris Streets really ought to be ashamed of himself for, as I was told, not taking to the stage since college; he's so impressively natural as Virginia's father, Mr. O'Hanlon – with his jovial patience and smart choices on line pauses – that I couldn't help but think of how many years we've been deprived of his acting talents. You'd better not deprive us of many more, Mr. Streets!

Written by Thom White

Monday, 05 December 2011 07:51

Gorski's script, however, has too many noticeable holes in it, the biggest of which is its timeline. Virginia writes her letter to the Sun's editor late on Christmas Eve. Her father then takes the letter not directly to the Sun, which might still be open, but to the post office. (This is well after business hours, mind you.) A postal employee then actually hand-delivers the letter to the Sun, where a writer struggling to come up with a Christmas-Day-edition article stops the presses to have his editorial, inspired by Virginia's letter, included. Fenday lazily acknowledges this implausible scenario with several lines from the postal delivery boy – including one about how the postal service has "a reputation to maintain, even on the holidays" – but still: An after-hours holiday delivery from the USPS? Now, that's some Christmas magic!

The author's – or perhaps Hayes' – decision to include a choir of children also proved a bit problematic. While I like the idea of a children's choir singing carols in between scenes, which adds a nice flow to the production, several of the older girls had problems maintaining their composure at the performance I attended, breaking into distracting fits of giggles during almost every interlude.

And then there was the mouse. Early on in Saturday's performance, Ian Black's Sun reporter, Francis P. Church, was exceedingly frightened by a rodent. Kutzli's Walter subsequently picked up the (stuffed) mouse by the tail and attempted to drop it into the waste can next to Francis' desk. He missed, however, and then didn't correct the mistake – the mouse, in fact, stayed on stage through the end of the play. That might seem easily forgivable, but it presented a big problem later in the show, when Francis must pick up the waste basket; despite being so initially scared by the mouse that he had to jump on top of his desk, Black didn't bat an eye when Francis' hand was inches away from the foul little beast.

Admittedly, I'm picking on small things, but they point to a bigger problem: while sweet and cheery, the Showboat's Yes, Virginia, There Is a Santa Claus didn't hold my attention enough to prevent me from overlooking several slight issues. As a professional production, the piece had its problems. Still, as a holiday show intended to inspire Christmas cheer – and one that left me in a brighter mood – the Showboat's effort is a nice bit of holiday entertainment.

Holiday Q & A: "Yes, Virginia, There Is a Santa Claus," at the Clinton Area Showboat Theatre through Dec

Written by Thom White

Monday, 05 December 2011 07:51

For tickets and information, call (563)242-6760 or visit ClintonShowboat.org .