“Representative government is a two-way street. It’s strengthened by dialogue between elected officials and the people we represent,” Grassley said. “I like to hold a combination of town meetings, where everyone is invited to attend and ask questions on any subject, and meetings where I go to people in their workplaces and at community events to talk with Iowans who may not go to a town meeting. I also really enjoy meeting with high school students as they study how our system of government works and gain an understanding of current events and government.”

More information about Grassley’s meeting schedule is below. The 11 town meetings are open to the public. Questions about other events should be directed to the host.

In addition to these meetings, Grassley is spending most of the August recess of the U.S. Senate in Iowa. He is participating in numerous public affairs programs with Iowa broadcasters and holding business meetings with Iowa community leaders. He spoke at the Family Leadership Summit in Ames and spent a day at the Iowa State Fair. Grassley is also visiting the Harry S. Truman Library & Museum in Missouri and the Dwight D.
